The results of a study of the effectiveness of a potent topical fluoridated mouthrinse in the treatment of chronic orofacial pain are described. Of the twenty-six patients who volunteered for the study, twenty-two responded to the treatment in that reduction in facial pain was achieved within one week of the beginning of treatment. The dental components of the study were acceptable to the patients, and no patients declined to participate. This study confirms the efficacy of fluoride in the treatment of chronic pain related to dental conditions. Long-term individual adjustment to asthma and influenza vaccinations among young adult patients with asthma. To investigate long-term individual adjustment to influenza and live attenuated influenza vaccine (LAIV) vaccinations among young adults with asthma and examine barriers to and factors associated with vaccinations. Participants (n = 30) diagnosed with asthma at least 1 year previously were recruited from an asthma clinic. All participants completed a 28-day recall period, and completed baseline questionnaires on self-reported asthma severity, asthma control, and vaccination history; 35 participants (73%) completed a follow-up questionnaire following a 7-month interval. Participants rated their preference for LAIV, live attenuated influenza vaccine (LAIV) and inactivated influenza vaccine (IIV) by preference and necessity (reverse-coded). Satisfaction with vaccinations and reasons for having or not having a vaccination. At follow-up, participants were more satisfied with their receipt of influenza vaccinations (p = .01) but were no more likely to have had a live attenuated influenza vaccine (LAIV) than an inactivated influenza vaccine (IIV). The main reason for nonvaccination was a dislike of needles. Health status and asthma control were not associated with vaccination intentions. Some 70% of participants considered LAIV more attractive than IIV, although LAIV requires a nasal spray and IIV requires an

So far, the main focus in the use of inorganic porous materials has been on the development of SOFCs with the highest possible oxygen activity on the anode side. For the cathode side, on the other hand, oxide materials containing metals of the 3d-series have been used for a long time, the main focus being for example the hydrogen oxidation reaction. The development of low cost and highly active oxygen reduction catalysts is, however, still in a very early stage. In contrast to the development of high-performance anodes and cathodes, a far more concerted effort has been undertaken in recent years to develop low cost manufacturing technologies. Just recently, a need for combination of the oxygen reduction catalysis and anode development has been emphasized by the interest in hydrogen oxidation fuel cells. On the cathode side, the use of high-temperature stable oxides has been thoroughly explored with the result that, in addition to Li-containing oxides, the most promising oxide electrode materials nowadays are N
